Passage-8: The term “killer bees” refers to a group of aggressive bees that escaped from an experiment in Brazil in 1957. They have migrated at a rate of 100-200 miles per year, and have arrived in the United States. There have been reports that killer bees are larger than the European honeybees we have grown accustomed to in the United States. In truth, they are a little smaller. Some people who have been stung have said that killer bees have stung them repeatedly. They are incapable of stinging more than once, as they lose their stinger with the first sting. Some have claimed that the venom of the killer bee is stronger than other bees. Actually, it is the same strength as other honeybees. Also some other people have claimed that they were “hunted” by killer bees; they, however, do not hunt. Nonetheless, they are more easily provoked than other bees, and when they become agitated they sting in groups, often chasing their victim. Identify implied main idea

✓ Some believe that Americans have become merely consumers of material goods who no longer care about helping others. This image is false, however. An estimated 90 million Americans volunteer, and the monetary value of their volunteer time is estimated at $200 billion a year. Many of these volunteers serve on committees, baby-sit, sing in church choirs, coach, and lead scout troops. More than 1.5 million of these volunteers provide fire protection and ambulance service without pay. Identify the stated main idea *1/1

There is much concern over accidents among children. In the age group from 15 to 24 years, pedestrian deaths constitute only twelve percent of the total for the group. In the age group from 0 to 14 years, the percentage is over sixty. There are five times as many deaths among young children as among youth. Yet people 65 years of age or older suffer an even greater percentage of pedestrian deaths (sixty-six percent) than do children! Such facts are useful in indicating where accident-prevention efforts should be concentrated. Identify the stated main idea

✓ Studies reveal that people's first names can have an influence on them. Some names reflect on people in a positive way. For example, one survey showed that Pakistani men consider Fatima as a name to be very polite and participants in a study thought Ali to be the name of someone very friendly. However, other names can have a negative impact. In one study, for instance, teachers gave lower grades to essay supposedly written by boys named Hammad and Akram than to the very same essay when they credited to boys with more popular names. Another study found girls with unpopular names did worse on IQ and achievement tests than girls with more appealing names. Identify the Stated main idea *1/1

Before the advent of computers and modern technology, people communicating over long distances used traditional means such as letters and the telephone. Nowadays, we have a vast array of communication tools which can complete this task, ranging from email to instant messaging and video calls. While, the present and previous means of communication are alike in their general form, they vary in regard to their speed and the range of tools available. Both methods relate to the form of communication. In the past, both written forms such as letters were frequently used, in addition to oral forms such as telephone calls. Likewise, people nowadays use both of these forms. Just as in the past, written forms of communication are prevalent, for example via email and text messaging. In addition, oral forms are still used, including the telephone, mobile phone, and voice messages via instant messaging services. Identify the pattern of organization in given passage.

I feel indignant when I see some people throwing trash bags in public places. Having picnics at beaches and lakes is unenjoyable because of sickening smells. Plastic cups and cases are spattered on the green lawn though a lot of trash tanks spread in the garden. The most infuriating scene is when I see some people arrive to the tank, but they put the trash out of it on the ground. They growl if I ask them to put it in its place. Moreover, some of them throw tissues and water bottles by windows while driving cars. All these behaviors signify their selfishness and careless of others' rights, for no hard fine charged on them.

College athletes are amateurs only in name and in the ill-defined commands of outdated policies. They produce annual profits, their efforts and images generate income from ticket sales, television and radio contracts, and merchandising. Yet, the bulk of this money goes directly to individual universities who then enforce codes that keep athletes from having the same opportunities to earn money as their peers. Clearly, it is time for Pakistani colleges to reevaluate this injustice. Little or no health insurance or benefits are provided for athletes to deal with the after-effects of injuries that often last long after the student has left college. Unlike most college athletes, in many ways, are treated more like indentured servants than like the highly visible and high valuable representatives of their institutions that they are. One afternoon in late August, as the summer's sun streamed into the car and made little jumping shadows on the windows, I sat gazing out at the tenement-dwellers, who were themselves looking out of their windows from the gray crumbling buildings along the tracks of upper Manhattan. As we crossed into the Bronx, the train unexpectedly slowed down for a few miles. Suddenly from out of my window I saw a large crowd near the tracks, held back by two policemen. Then, on the other side from my window, I saw a sight I would never be able to forget: a little boy almost severed in halves, lying at an incredible angle near the track. The ground was covered with blood, and the boy's eyes were opened wide, strained and disbelieving in his sudden oblivion. A policeman stood next to him, his arms folded, staring straight ahead at the windows of our train. In the orange glow of late afternoon the policemen, the crowd, the corpse of the boy were for a brief moment immobile, motionless, a small tableau to violence and death in the city. Behind me, in the next row of seats, there was a game of bridge. I heard one of the four men say as he looked out at the sight, "God, that's horrible." Another said, in a whisper, "Terrible, terrible." There was a momentary silence, punctuated only by the clicking of wheels on the track. Then, after the pause, I heard the first man say: "Two hearts." Identify the types of Writing

My friend Ali has many likable qualities. He is kind hearted, very thoughtful, and friendly to everyone. Because he is smart, he knows how to use humor to get his point across without hurting anyone's feelings. Ali is also familiar with how to use humor to motivate people and how to get people to agree with him. The most important thing I like about him is that I know he would never turn his back on me or lie to me or my family. I feel very lucky to have someone like my friend because I can count on him in many ways. If your car broke down far away from home in the middle of the night, Ali is the kind of person who would get out of bed to pick you up. I have learned how to treat other people better through watching him, and he has shown me what it means to be honest and trustworthy. Identify the type of Writing

According to Leming and Dickinson (1990), grief peaks in the week after a loved one's funeral. To help the bereaved, friends and family should try not to make demands on the grieving individual. Instead, they should allow the bereaved time to grieve. The bereaved can also be helped by assisting them with daily household chores. It is likewise helpful to talk with the bereaved person about the deceased and to express one's own feelings of sadness and loss but without pity. Friends and family can also help the bereaved by keeping regular contact with them, inviting them to dinner or to movies or just offering a friendly call or a visit.
